

IAA CEO wins Director of the Year award from Airport Revenue News

INDIANAPOLIS – Airport Revenue News (ARN) announced today that John D. Clark III, executive director and CEO for the Indianapolis Airport Authority (IAA), has won the prestigious 2011 Director of the Year award among airports with less than 4 million total annual enplanements. He will be interviewed in and featured on the cover of the November 2011 issue of ARN.

The ARN editorial staff selected from a pool of highly qualified candidates based on their excellence in the areas of leadership, innovation, revenue generation, marketing, customer service, community service, and proactive efforts to advance the airport industry. According to ARN, Clark was chosen as the candidate who excelled in all of the aforementioned areas.

“We are very pleased to have chosen John Clark for our next Director of the Year,” said Pauline Armbrust, president and CEO of ARN. “He has proven leadership qualities and has been an advocate for the airport industry for several years, championing the industry’s causes as former chairman of ACI and currently as director of IAA.”

“I am honored by this recognition, which underscores the efforts the entire IAA team has made toward being the airport system of choice for all of our stakeholders,” said Clark. “I sincerely thank ARN and our staff, whose dedication to the IAA strategy of finding innovative ways to enhance the quality of life and economic growth of our region was critical to this achievement.”

About ARN

ARN is a monthly trade magazine devoted to coverage of all revenue-generating issues affecting the airport industry. The publication is the foremost news and information resource for airport executives, concessionaires, consultants, and others involved in the aviation industry. ARN also conducts a Best Concessions competition, the winners of which will be featured in the May 2012 issue. The ARN awards are highly coveted and considered the most prestigious in the airport industry.

###